

Osprey Submits Proposal for U.S. Border Wall

March 24, 2017

ATLANTA, Georgia: During his election campaign, President Donald Trump stressed the importance of sealing the border with Mexico by building a wall. The 1,200-mile wall will span all the way from San Diego to Brownsville, Texas. Currently, around half the area is already covered by fences and walls. The U.S. Customs and Border Protection Department has requested proposals from vendors to construct the wall. Osprey Management is one of a handful Georgia-based construction firms vying for the coveted project.

Albeit controversial, Kelvin King, owner of Osprey Management, noted that this project is merely a "...business opportunity and would not 'let [his] politics get involved.'" The Atlanta Journal Constitution recently interviewed King and reported his stance on the project, "Regardless if you like it or not, it is going to go forward, it sounds like ... I have no idea or thoughts or influence on where it goes. But right now, it looks real. And if it looks real, we have real ideas."

The Department requested contractors submit proposals for a solid concrete wall and a see-through wall. There are a number of specifications, and hundreds of companies around the nation have expressed interest. The U.S. Customs and Border Protection Department will review the submissions and announce the winners in due course. The winners will have to make a pitch to the department after their selection.

According to a spokesperson for Osprey Management, "Osprey Management has enjoyed considerable success in the recent past, and we are well-placed to cater to the needs of the government."

Osprey Management was set up as a construction company catering primarily to local, state, and federal government agencies. The track record and performance of the company up to this point places it in a strong position to land the opportunity to submit a proposal. Osprey Management recently completed five years in the industry, and if their interest is accepted, they will get a chance to take their business to the next level.
